 most interesting women in history were aggressive types. When the situation calls for this approach the smart woman recognizes it and is equal to it.

Dear Ann Landers: Our teenage daughter was visiting in the home of a girl friend last evening and the girl's parents got into an argument.

It was embarrassing for our daughter to be in on a family quarrel. She asked her friend to drive her home. The friend refused, saying all families have arguments and that she should pay no attention. Our daughter stayed and had a miserable evening.

I told her this morning she should have telephoned home and asked her father to come and get her. She says this would have been rude. I say it would have been better manners than staying around and witnessing a family fight. May we have your opinion?—
TRIANGLE

Dear Triangle: It depends on the nature of the fight. If it was just a few moments of disagreement, your daughter should have ignored it. If, however, it was a knock-down-drag-out battle, your daughter should have called home for transportation.
